PARTY PLATFORMS AND THE IOWA CONVENTION.

PARTY PLATFORMS AND THE IOWA CONVENTION.

There is no trush more worthless, as a general rule, than political platforms. It constitutes the highest merit of a writer of such literature to be able to use artfully equivocal language, which while it seems to mean something, really means nothing. Another well known fact is that the pledges made in platforms are seldom kept in good faith, being considered as mere glittering generalities, intended to eatch votes.

Just prior to the beginning of the Presidential campaign of 1876, however, it became evident to politicians that there were certain subjects in regard to which public sentiment was so thoroughly aroused that no equivocal declarations in regard to them would be tolerated. Two of these subjects were civil service reform and the pacification of the South. Accordingly the platform adopted by the Republican convention used the plainest and clearest language in treating of these subjects, and pledged the party to a policy of conciliation towards the South, and such a reform of the civil service as would make honesty, fidelity and capacity the only tests of fitness for official appointments.

In regard to civil service reform the Dem-

In regard to eivil service reform the Democratic Convection reiterated in stronger terms, if possible, the same doctrine. Mr. HAYES, in his letter of acceptance, gave special prominence to this subject. He accepted the principles of the platform in language remarkable for its elearness and emphasis. He said the reform should be thorough, radical and complete. He said that public officers should give their whole service to the Government and the people, who neither expected nor-desired from them any partisan service. In his inaugural address he referred to the fact that both of the political parties were pledged to civil service reform in terms almost identically the same, and expressed the belief that the people desired that public officers should owe their whole services to the Government.

In the administration of his office President HAYES has strictly observed the principles thus solemnly laid down. Since he has been in office he has made comparatively few remacals, and in every instance he has unquestionably endeavored to be governed by rules founded upon a sound interpretation of the platform upon which be was elected. We do not say that in the discharge of a daty so difficult the President may not have made mistakes, and even very serious mistakes. Being human he is of course liable to err, but upon the whole his action must be acknowledged by every dispossionate person to have been prudent and wese. Even in roses in which the public was disposed to include in severe criticisms, it has turned out that when all the facts and circumstances became known they afferded abundant reasons for his justification. He has made a fair record upon this subject, and we challenge the strictest serving of every appointment he has made, confident that it will not be found that he has intentionally violated any principle of time civil service reform.

In view of all these facts we are astonished at the action of the lowa Republican Convention, on Thursday, in adopting a platform which indirectly disapproves of the course o he is solemnly pledged until he is certain that it is disapproved of by the people, and not merely by the leaders.

adopted for its suppression; and experience teaches that success has attended the efforts teaches that success has attended the efforts of government in this direction in inverse proportion to the amount of severity in the penalty denounced by the low. Under the theoretic polity of the Hebrews and the carlier nations, where almost every species of offenses was punished by death, the greatest immorality prevailed, and crime seemed to increase with the baptism of blood, and spread with the story of its expisition. So, under the Draconian code, where every offense of which the law took notices. every offense of which the law took notice was punishable with death, the spirit of retalintion and revenge never went unappeased and every injury demanded a victim and every injury demanded a victim Later, when milder systems of punishmen were introduced, crime sensibly diminished and the world rested as well from the violence of the mob as from the terrors of the execution.

In the days of BLACKSTONE, when one hundred and sixty offenses were punishable with death to two at the present time, Eng-land was a turbulent country compared with the Britain of to-day. Hence extreme penalties do not appear to have warrant in the records of history, as furnishing a guar-anty against the assaults of the vicious, and the great social question of the future. and the great social question of the inter-as in the past, is the proper means for the prevention of crime. About fifty cases of hangling have occurred in the United States within the last six months, according to a popular chronicle, and in the very locality where most of those have averaged the crime of murder that offense is more common than elsewhere in the country. It seems to us that while so much attention is being bestowed upon the more agreeable subjects appearaining to the welfare of the Union, there should be some concerted action among the States looking to the adoption of a general theory in relation to the development and prevalence of crime and the enactment of a uniform law for its prevention and punishment. An inter-State Congress might accomplish much in this respect, but its delegates should be others than those in charge of prisons in the different States, whose minds have become prone to one view in consequence of their practical relations with the convicts in their charge.
